Virginia Lineage.
HICKORY GROVE, Jan. 2, 1893.
To the Editor of the Alexandria Gazette: In the Richmond Times of date December 26th, is printed an interesting and instructive lecture headed "Virginia Lineage," delivered by Captain John S. Wise before the Congregational Club.
The basic facts of Virginia's history are clearly and entertainingly related and perhaps by far the most of our people are told more about themselves than they knew before. It is a pity that we do not have more of this kind of literature, for in the unrest and turmoil of the present it is well, occasionally, to turn back our thoughts to the past.
Captain Wise refers to his own sole "patriotic" ancestor and the idea intrudes itself that perhaps from the action of some of the mysterious laws of hereditary, on that score the speaker's political fervorings can be accounted for; which view of the matter certainly relieves him of much responsibility.
The lecture concludes with an eloquent reference to the battle of Gettysburg, the speaker's culminating point of Virginia's history. In Pickett's Division which was immortalized by the heroic charge on Cemetery heights, was embodied the flower of the men of our State.
Representatives of every section and of every branch of the old stock were there to die. The battle roll of Pickett contained almost every name that had been prominent in Virginia for 250 years and many of those names were particularly mentioned.
It was strange that with all the special and minute information manifestly required in the construction of the lecture Captain Wise should have omitted a name which had, at least, equal right to be considered historically prominent. Two of Virginia's Colonial Governors were Berkeleys, and from by far the best of these, Norborne Berkeley, Lord Botetourt, the gallant gentleman to whom I wish to refer, was collaterally descended.
The 8th regiment of Virginia infantry charged in Pickett's "battle line," and played its full part in that day's glorious disaster. Of that regiment the lieutenant colonel, major and two of the captains were brothers, and Berkeley's three were wounded and captured, and one, Major Edmund Berkeley, wounded, and carried from the stricken field in company with the brave Hutton, who commanded the regiment.
After Gettysburg and the promotion of Colonel Hutton in place of the lamented Garnett, dead on the field of honor, the 8th was usually spoken of as the "Berkeley regiment," from the perhaps singular fact that the three field officers and one of the captains were members of the same family.
From Manassas to Appomattox they were noted for their courage, fortitude and devotion. In the darkest hour they bared not one jot of heart or hope, and their faith endured even unto the end.
Humane and generous they spared no means within their control for the good of the cause, or for the comfort and wellbeing of those under their immediate command.
The 8th regiment, unaided by reinforcement until the victory was almost won, fought the battle of Leesburg, and defeated General Baker, whose force outnumbered the 8th more than ten to one. The battle lasted until after dark when the enemy retreated from the field, but was not pursued. The 8th regiment was ordered back to its camp, and Lieutenant Charles Berkeley left in command of a small picket on the battle field. Some hours after he sent to the regiment for a force to assist in capturing a large body of the disorganized enemy, which was grouped on the river bank, and escaping in detail by boat. The field officer in command of the regiment refused to order the men on duty, but after some persuasion consented that they might volunteer, at the same time advising them not to do so, as the risk was too great. Captains Edmund and William Berkeley, with a few officers and a handful of men, marched off in the dark and took about four hundred and fifty prisoners, which number added to those captured in the fight, brought the sum total up to nearly 750.
Captain Edmund Berkeley had the prisoners in charge when the commanding general sent an officer with a large coil of rope, and orders to tie their hands behind them, and start them off in the dark to Manassas. Captain Berkeley protested against this as being cruel and inhuman, and refused to relinquish his charge until the order was revoked, which, after some trouble and delay, was done. Such treatment of prisoners of war would doubtless have provoked retaliation, and how much subsequent suffering was averted by Captain Berkeley's humane and spirited conduct can only be left to conjecture.
It was said in praise of Augustus Cesar, that he found Rome a city of brick, and left it a city of marble. The 8th Virginia Regiment found its first commander the Commonwealth's Attorney of a county court, and left him with a name among the paladins of Lee's "array of bright muskets, and ragged uniforms," than whom no nobler knighthood the world has seen since the days of good King Arthur's round table down to the present hour; a popular and successful lawyer; a distinguished member of the federal House of Representatives; and now a peer among the "most potent, grave, and reverend seigniors" of our nation. E.
